

Emily Lesk

Professor Arraéz

Electric Rhetoric

15 September 2004

Red, White, and Everywhere

America, I have a confession to make: I don't drink Coke. But don't call me a hypocrite just because I am still the proud owner of a bright red shirt that advertises it. Just call me an American.

Even before setting foot in Israel three years ago, I knew exactly where I could find one. The tiny T-shirt shop in the central block of Jerusalem's Ben Yehuda Street did offer other designs, but the one with a bright white "Drink Coca-Cola Classic" written in Fig. 1. Hebrew Coca-Cola T-shirt, personal photograph by author, 8 Sept. 2004.

Hebrew cursive across the chest was what drew in most of the dollar-carrying tourists. While waiting almost twenty minutes for my shirt (depicted in Fig. 1), I watched nearly every customer ahead of me ask for "the Coke shirt, todah rabah [thank you very much]."

At the time, I never thought it strange that I wanted one, too. After having absorbed sixteen years of Coca-Cola propaganda through everything from NBC's Saturday morning cartoon lineup to the concession stand at Camden Yards (the Baltimore Orioles' ballpark), I associated the shirt with singing along to the "Just for the Taste of It" jingle and with America's favorite pastime, not with a brown fizzy beverage I refused to consume. When I later realized the immensity of Coke's corporate power, I felt somewhat duped and manipulated, but that didn't stop me from wearing the shirt. I still don it often, despite the growing hole in the right sleeve, because of its power as a conversation piece. Few Americans notice it without asking something like "Does that say Coke?" I usually smile and nod. Then they mumble a one-word compliment and we go our separate ways. But rarely do they want to know what language the internationally recognized logo is written in. And why should they? They are interested in what they can relate to as Americans: a familiar red-and-white logo, not a foreign language. Through nearly a century of brilliant advertising strategies, the Coca-Cola Company has given Americans not only a thirst-quenching beverage but a cultural icon that we have come to claim as our own.

Throughout the company's history, its marketing strategies have centered on putting Coca-Cola in scenes of the happy, carefree existence Americans are supposedly striving for. What 1950's teenage girl, for example, wouldn't long to see herself in the Coca-Cola ad that appeared in a 1958 issue of Seventeen magazine? A clean-cut, handsome man flirts with a pair of smiling girls as they laugh and drink Cokes at a soda-shop counter. Even a girl who couldn't picture herself in that idealized role could at least buy a Coke for consolation. The malt shop, complete with a soda jerk in a white jacket and paper hat and a Coca-Cola fountain, is a theme that, even today, remains a piece of Americana (Ikuta 74).

But while countless campaigns with this general strategy have together shaped the Coca-Cola image, presenting a product as key to a happy life is a fairly typical approach to advertising everything from Allstate insurance to Ziploc bags. Coca-Cola's advertising strategy is unique, however, for the original way the beverage giant has used the specific advertising media of magazines and television to drive home this message. As a result, Coca-Cola has become associated not only with the images of Americana portrayed in specific advertisements but also with the general forms of advertising media that dominate American culture.

One of the earliest and best-known examples of this strategy is artist Haddon Sundblom's rendering of Santa Claus. Prior to Coca-Cola's Santa campaign of 1931, depictions of Saint Nick took many different forms, although he was usually slim and dressed in a wide variety of colors. Ironically, it was a Swede who created the round, jolly, red-and-white American icon (see Fig. 2), who just so happens to delight in an ice-

Fig. 2. Coca-Cola Santa pin, personal photograph by author, 9
Sept. 2004.

cold Coke after a tiring night of delivering presents. The way in which Coca-Cola advertisers utilized the concept of the magazine to present this inviting image represents Coca-Cola's brilliant manipulation of the medium itself (Pendergrast 181).

In today's world of CNN, e-journals, and newsweek.com, we often forget how pervasive a medium the magazine was before television became easily and cheaply available to all. Well into the 1960s, American households of diverse backgrounds and geographic locations subscribed loyally to general-subject weeklies and monthlies such as Life and the Saturday Evening Post, which provided a primary source of news, entertainment, and other cultural information to families nationwide. This large and constant group of subscribers enabled Coca-Cola to build an annual Christmastime campaign that used an extremely limited number of advertisements. According to the Coca-Cola Company Web site, Sundblom created only around forty images of Santa Claus during the campaign's duration from 1931 to 1964 ("Haddon Sundblom"). As a result, Americans soon began to look forward to and seek out the ads each holiday season. The marketing strategy was not to capture consumers with the attractive color drawings but rather to make them wait eagerly by the mailbox each December so that they could flip through the Saturday Evening Post to find the latest scene featuring Santa gulping a Coke. For this strategy to be successful, the advertisements had to be seen by many, but they also had to be just hard enough to come by to seem special and exclusive. What better way to achieve these dual goals than to place an advertisement in the December issue of an immensely popular magazine?

This is just one example of the media strategies Coca-Cola has used to encourage us to equate Coke with the "happy life" element of American identity. As the omnipresent magazine gave way to television, Coke was there from the beginning. In a 1996 recap of the previous fifty years in industry history, Beverage Industry cites Coca-Cola as a frontrunner in the very first form of television advertising: sponsorship of entire programs such as The Bob Dixon Show and The Adventures of Kit Carson ("Fabulous Fifties" 16). Just as today we associate national and patriotic events such as the 2002

Winter Olympics with their list of corporate sponsors (which in this case includes the Coca-Cola Company), viewers of early television programs will forever equate them with Coke.

When networks switched from offering sponsorships to selling exclusive commercial time in short increments, Coca-Cola strove to distinguish itself once again, this time by experimenting with new formats and technologies for those commercials. Early attempts--such as choppy "stop motion" animation, where photographs of objects such as Coke bottles move without the intervention of actors--attracted much attention, according to the Library of Congress Motion Picture Archives Web site. Coca-Cola was also a pioneer in color television; after a series of experimental reels, the company produced its first color commercial in 1964 (Fifty Years). While the subject matter of these original commercials was not particularly memorable (Coca-Cola cans and bottles inside a refrigerator), the hype surrounding the use of new technologies helped draw attention to the product.

But the advertising campaign that perhaps best illustrates the ability of Coca-Cola advertisers to tie their product to a groundbreaking technology did not appear until 1993, just in time for Coke's sponsorship of the 1994 Winter Olympics. Who can forget the six television commercials featuring digitally animated polar bears that roll, swim, snuggle, slide, and gurgle about in a computerized North Pole--and finish off the playful experience with a swig of Coke? In 1993, two years before the release of Toy Story, these commercials were some of the very first widely viewed digital films (Fifty Years). As with Sundblom's Santa Clauses, television viewers looked forward to their next sighting of the cute, cuddly, cutting-edge bears, who created a natural association between Coca-

Cola and digital animation and, to a certain extent, Olympic spirit. Once again, Coke didn't just use the latest technology--Coke defined it.

As a result of this brilliant advertising, a beverage I never even drink is a significant part of my American cultural identity--because I connect it with watching the Olympics on TV and my first encounter with digital animation. That's why I spent thirty Israeli shekels and twenty minutes in a tourist trap I would ordinarily avoid buying my Hebrew Coca-Cola shirt. That shirt, along with the rest of the enormous Coca-Cola collectibles industry, demonstrates Coke's power to identify itself with the American ideal of a lighthearted life of diversion and pleasure. Standing in line halfway around the world for the logo that embodies these values gave me an opportunity to affirm a part of my American identity.

Works Cited

Coca-Cola Santa pin. Personal photograph by author. 9 Sept. 2004.

“The Fabulous Fifties.” Beverage Industry 87.6 (1996): 16. 2 Sept. 2004

<<http://memory.loc.gov/ammem/ccmphtml/indshst.html>>.

Fifty Years of Coca-Cola Television Advertisements: Highlights from the Motion Picture

Archives of the Library of Congress. 2000. Motion Picture, Broadcasting, and Recorded Sound Div., Library of Congress, 5 Sept. 2004 <[\[emory.loc.gov/ammem/ccmphtml/index.html\]\(http://memory.loc.gov/ammem/ccmphtml/index.html\)>.](http://<div data-bbox=)

“Haddon Sundblom.” Coca-Cola and Christmas. 1999. 2 Sept. 2004 <[\[www.coca-cola.com.ar/Coca-colaweb/paginas\\_ingles/christmas.html\]\(http://www.coca-cola.com.ar/Coca-colaweb/paginas_ingles/christmas.html\)>.](http://<div data-bbox=)

Hebrew Coca-Cola T-shirt. Personal photograph by author. 2 Jan. 2001.

Ikuta, Yasutoshi, ed. '50s American Magazine Ads. Tokyo: Graphic-Sha, 1987.

Pendergrast, Mark. For God, Country, and Coca-Cola: The Unauthorized History of the Great American Soft Drink and the Company That Makes It. New York:

Macmillan, 1993.